PART-A
(40 Marks)

*This Section should be answered only on the Answer Booklet provided.
Marks for each question is indicated against it. Attempt all questions.*

1. Write a precis of the following passage and give a suitable title. (10)

Gardening is one of the oldest and most rewarding human activities. Long before the rise of modern cities and industries, people cultivated plants not only for food but also for beauty and peace of mind. In today's fast-paced world, gardening remains a quiet yet powerful way to reconnect with nature and oneself. It teaches patience, care, and respect for life. Watching a seed sprout, grow, and bloom is a reminder that growth cannot be hurried and that every living thing requires time and attention to flourish. Beyond personal satisfaction, gardening plays a vital role in environmental balance. Gardens act as miniature ecosystems that support a variety of life—bees, butterflies, birds, and countless microorganisms. In urban areas, gardens help reduce air pollution, provide shade, and lower temperatures. They also improve soil quality and contribute to water conservation when managed responsibly. Even a few pots on a balcony can make a difference by absorbing carbon dioxide and releasing oxygen. Thus, gardening, in its simplest form, becomes a small act of environmental activism. Moreover, gardening promotes mental and physical well-being. Studies have shown that spending time with plants reduces stress, lowers blood pressure, and improves concentration. Digging, planting, and weeding are gentle forms of exercise that keep the body active and flexible. The sense of purpose that comes from nurturing life can lift one's mood and help overcome feelings of anxiety or loneliness. For many, gardens become personal sanctuaries—a place to reflect, create, and find joy in the smallest details of life. Gardening also encourages sustainability and self-reliance. Growing one's own fruits, vegetables, and herbs reduces dependence on commercially grown products, which often involves heavy use of chemicals and long-distance transportation. A home garden promotes healthier eating habits and teaches respect for the effort involved in producing food. Community gardens, in particular, bring people together. They transform unused spaces into areas of cooperation, sharing, and friendship. People from different backgrounds come together to work on a common project, bridging gaps and strengthening community ties. However, modern lifestyles and urbanization have made gardening more challenging. Limited space, lack of time, and disconnection from nature discourage people from taking up this rewarding activity. Yet, with creativity and determination, gardening can be adapted to modern life. Vertical gardens, hydroponics, and rooftop gardens are examples of innovative solutions that bring greenery into compact spaces. Schools and workplaces can also introduce gardening programs to foster awareness of sustainability and environmental care among young people. In the end, gardening is more than a hobby; it is a way of life. It teaches responsibility, gratitude, and balance. A gardener learns that every season has its rhythm, every plant its need, and every effort its reward. As cities grow and technology advances, the humble act of tending to a plant reminds us that we are still part of nature, not separate from it. To garden is to nurture life, and in doing so, to nurture the gardener's own soul.

3. Read the given passage carefully and answer the questions that follow. Your answers must be based on the passage only.

On a radiant Saturday morning, Bara Bazar, the commercial heart of Aizawl, pulsated with characteristic vitality. The air was an intricate blend of aroma- smoked meat, roasted corn, and freshly harvested vegetables- interwoven with the hum of animated bargaining. Stalls overflowed with vivid textiles, fruits, and handicrafts, while the rhythm of footsteps and voices formed the living music of the marketplace.

Amidst this dynamic scene moved an elderly woman, a vendor from a nearby village. She bore a woven bamboo basket laden with oranges and bananas, the product of her modest livelihood. Her steps were deliberate yet weary from the long descent from her hillside home. As she approached the Dawrpui junction steps, the uneven pavement caused her to stumble slightly, sending her basket tumbling to the ground. The fruits scattered chaotically, rolling between stalls and down the slope, drawing the attention of nearby onlookers.

For a brief interlude, the bustling crowd seemed suspended in hesitation. Some individuals watched with detached curiosity, while others appeared momentarily uncertain of how to intervene. It was then that a group of college students, observing the incident, instinctively hurried forward. Demonstrating commendable civic empathy, they gathered the fallen fruits with meticulous care, brushing away dust and restoring them to the basket. One student extended a steadying hand to the woman, while another insisted on carrying her burden up the remaining flight of steps.

The woman's countenance, once clouded with distress, softened into an expression of profound gratitude. In a trembling yet affectionate voice, she uttered, "Thank you, may God bless you." The sincerity of her words evoked a quiet sense of reverence among the bystanders. Nearby vendors nodded approvingly, some offering the young helpers roasted corn and tea as tokens of appreciation.

For a few fleeting moments, the frenetic rhythm of the marketplace seemed to dissolve into a shared stillness—a recognition of genuine human solidarity. The scene, though simple, encapsulated a deeper moral truth: that kindness persists even amidst the noise of modern urban life.

For the onlookers, the episode served as a subtle yet powerful reminder of communal compassion and ethical responsibility, virtues deeply embedded within Mizo culture. Amid the hurried exchanges and commercial bustle of Bara Bazar, that small gesture of humanity shone like a quiet beacon—affirming that benevolence, however ordinary, continues to bind society together in its most authentic form.
